A BRIEF HISTORY

Here upon this room lies rich history. In 1871 the great barroom for the Pacific Grand Hotel, operated by John Drake once stood here before burning to the ground in the Great Chicago Fire. Rebuilt in 1873, it was the largest hotel structure in the world. Drake entertained presidents, dignitaries, and tycoons upon this exact location. It was known as the Headquarters of Statesmen.

On October 11, 1883 Standard Time was adopted on this site where the future was forever changed.

Over the years, the buildings here have been owned by the great railroad companies, L.Z. Leiter of the Marshall Field & Company, and Northwestern University before eventually being sold to the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, who remodeled and rebuilt the current facade and a 2-story building with ten ton vault doors said to be impenetrable to cracksmen, a design above the main entrance resembling the Pantheon, and the grand second floor main banking space resembling that of today.

In 1921 a giant blimp, owned by Good Year, crashed and exploded through the skylight on the second floor destroying much of the roof and second floor. The building was repaired and built 24 stories taller eventually becoming the Continental Illinois Bank Building. Continental became insolvent in 1984 and was bailed out by the FDIC for 5.5 billion and 8 billion in loans. It was the first time "too big to fail" was popularized and largest federal bailout until Washington Mutual in 2008.
